“ Volunteerism is important in ensuring participation, and in localizing the Sustainable Development Goals and accelerating action on the ground. --Ms Pattarat Hongtong, Director-General of TICA, Ministry of Foreign Affairs

Thanking all stakeholders for the invaluable partnership, Ms Hongtong pointed to the case studies highlighted in the publication, reiterating, "Thailand is able to extend this approach far beyond geographical barriers and to bridge peoples of Thailand and other countries" through the programme.

Normative discussions of volunteerism and South-South cooperation note that they share common principles of 'mutuality, reciprocity, respect and equality', and that they have the potential to promote participatory and needs-based approaches to development, while cultivating global citizens and strengthening people to people ties. The publication reiterates that South-South cooperation and volunteerism are mutually reinforcing and highly compatible concepts.

“ There are still gaps in evidence, and there is a need for exchanging practices on how to document volunteer contributions to recipient country national development strategies and broader Sustainable Development Goal (SDG) efforts. --Shalina Miah, UNV Regional Manager for Asia & the Pacific

Launching the publication, UNV Regional Manager for Asia and the Pacific, Shalina Miah, said, "We hope that this publication will further enhance understanding of the roles of volunteerism and South-South cooperation in supporting communities through the current crisis and into the future".

“Volunteers may have been the magic ingredient behind Thailand’s success with managing the COVID-19 pandemic [...] At ESCAP, we are convinced that South-South cooperation and volunteerism will be critical means to chart a pathway for our region’s inclusive, resilient and green recovery from the COVID-19 pandemic. --Mr Kaveh Zahedi, Deputy Executive Secretary for Sustainable Development, ESCAP

Mr Zahedi continued, "The role of volunteers, however, goes beyond such emergencies. In this regard, I welcome the publication launched today. This document not only highlights the contribution of volunteerism, but also helps us to build on these initiatives to make the movement of volunteerism in our region even stronger than before."
