Providing life-saving healthcare for refugees in Jordan

Saima graduated from Rawalpindi Medical College in Pakistan and obtained her diploma and Master’s degree in Public Health from the London School of Hygiene and Tropical Medicine. After completing her studies, Saima worked as Gender Officer in UNHCR Afghanistan, as well as Medical Officer in University Teaching Hospital in Lusaka, Zambia.

Saima joined UNV in Jordan in May 2017 as UN Volunteer Associate Public Health Officer at UNHCR, and recently finished her one-year assignment.

“I myself was a refugee child from Afghanistan and always wanted to work for refugees and vulnerable people, become a strong advocate for their rights.”
and help them cope with difficulties they face. Working with the most vulnerable people and assisting them in getting a better health was my biggest motivation to become a UN Volunteer. -- Saima Khan, UN Volunteer with UNHCR, Jordan

During her assignment, Saima was helping Syrian refugees at the UN-operated medical clinic located in Rukban camp, an arid remote area near the extreme northeast of Jordan, close to the joint borders with Syria and Iraq.

Rukban camp has a population of nearly 50000.00 individuals and the UN clinic where Saima served is the only health facility available to provide services for the residents of the camp.

"The majority of the displaced population at the camp are women and children, seeking assistance in a place where there is no adequate community health response capacity except for the UN clinic," Saima explains.

"At the UN clinic we provided primary health care for many patients in desperate need for help and I happened to witness many children’s lives being saved. We also helped patients with life threatening ailments to get transferred to hospitals in Jordan for further treatment."

It is invaluable to have qualified UN Volunteers like Saima as members of UNHCR, particularly in the harsh and difficult remote duty station, where beneficiaries are in a dare need of high quality services. As a former International UN Volunteer myself, I believe in volunteerism as a core sprit of the UN activities, not only for its expression of solidarity in action but also for its embedded professionalism. - -Tomoya Soejima, supervisor of Saima and head of the UNHCR sub-office in Ruwaished
Together with UNHCR partners, Saima was involved in program planning, monitoring and evaluation to effectively address public health and health care issues at Rukban clinic. She also ensured that public health services provided at the clinic complied with required national and international standards.

Additionally, Saima supported partners in implementation of public health programs and facilitated their access to trainings, with a particular focus on health information and disease surveillance, safe motherhood and integrated management of childhood illnesses.
