Summary

At its thirty-ninth session, the Commission for Social Development considered two topics under its agenda and multi-year programme of work, namely the priority theme “Enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world” and the sub-theme “The role of volunteerism in the promotion of social development”; and the review of relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups.

With regard to the priority theme, the Commission adopted a resolution in which, inter alia, it recognized the need for further analyses, research and sharing of views with regard to “enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world” and decided to consider possible ways of further examining this issue at a future session.

Concerning the sub-theme, the Commission adopted a resolution on volunteering and social development, in which, inter alia, it welcomed the work of the United Nations Volunteers as the focal point for the International Year of Volunteers; encouraged Governments to support voluntary action by creating a favourable enabling environment, to take into consideration volunteerism in national development planning and to consider all means available for more people to become involved in voluntary action and to be drawn from a broader cross-section of society; and encouraged organizations of the United Nations system to further support voluntary action for social development.

In connection with its review of plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups, the Commission recommended to the General Assembly, through the Economic and Social Council, a resolution on the preparation for and observance of the tenth anniversary of the International Year of the Family, in which, inter alia, it urged Governments to view 2004 as a target year by which concrete achievements should be made to identify and elaborate issues of direct concern to families; requested the Commission to continue to review annually the preparations for the tenth anniversary; and invited Member States to consider organizing activities at the national level in preparation for the celebration of the tenth anniversary of the International Year of the Family.

The Commission also recommended to the Economic and Social Council the adoption of a resolution on the multi-year programme of work of the Commission for Social Development for the period 2002-2006, built around the follow-up to the World Summit for Social Development and the twenty-fourth special session of the General Assembly, incorporating also the review of relevant United Nations plans and programmes of action pertaining to the situation of social groups.

Panel discussions with invited experts were held on the priority theme “Enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world” and on the sub-theme “The role of volunteerism in the promotion of social development”. A dialogue with non-governmental organizations was also held.

The Commission also reviewed the proposed programme of work of the Division for Social Policy and Development for the biennium 2002-2003, and the report of the Board of the United Nations Research Institute for Social Development for the period 1999-2000. It renominated three existing members and nominated six new members to the Board, for confirmation by the Economic and Social Council.

Finally, the Commission recommended that the Economic and Social Council approve the provisional agenda and documentation for its fortieth session in 2002.

Chairman's summary of the expert panel discussion on enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world

23. At its 12th meeting, on 23 February, on the proposal of the Chairman, the Commission decided to include in its report the Chairman's summary of the expert panel discussion on enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world (see chap. I, sect. E, decision 39/102).

24. The Chairman's summary of the expert panel discussion on enhancing social protection and reducing vulnerability in a globalizing world is set out below:

Introduction

There is no single solution to the challenge of social protection. Each country must decide on the appropriate balance between different protection measures (public-private, formal-community driven, etc.). Social protection is a broad concept, which encompasses a range of policy measures, including not only pensions, but also health care, family allowances, unemployment insurance, disability protection, rehabilitation and in many countries social assistance. Social protection is an investment. The allocation of resources to social protection benefits not only the recipients but society as a whole. There is a substantial cost for not having comprehensive social security systems in place. In processes of adjustment, change and transformation, in particular, it is of vital importance to ensure adequate social protection.

Challenges at the national level

Differences in values, traditions, institutions and differences in context such as demographic pressures, economic growth, overall financial resources, external indebtedness and size, inter alia, explain differences in the construct of social protection at the national level. We are facing important social transformations, illustrated by the quick drop in fertility rates and the overall increase in the size of the elderly population in both the developed and the developing world. For example, ageing and the rise of the dependency ratio are fundamental problems in the developed market economies, although less so in a large number of developing countries. HIV/AIDS is having a devastating impact in many countries, particularly in sub-Saharan Africa and South Africa. Migration and displacement due to conflict and/or an increase in poverty raise the demands for social protection in a number of countries all over the world. Slow economic growth or stagnation limits the introduction of active social protection that is urgently needed. Servicing of external debt reduces domestic revenues that otherwise could go to social protection. Poverty is rising and the number of female single-headed families with small children is also on the rise. Women and children are in a particularly vulnerable and weak position when they lack effective programmes to help them overcome adversity and raise their expected income. Figures on social protection coverage show major disparities among countries and within regions. For example, in Latin America alone, social protection coverage varies between 10 and 80 per cent. The International Labour Organization (ILO) estimates that only one fourth of the labour force in many of the developing countries are covered by formal social protection systems, leaving three quarters of the labour force outside them. Typically, the small proportion of the labour force that is covered is mostly found in the modern and formal sector. The vast majority of workers without the coverage of a social protection system belong to the informal sector, which is growing in many countries.

Partnerships

There was agreement that Governments play a fundamental role in the coverage of social contingencies faced by the people living in poverty, who are generally neither covered by for-profit private action nor by not-for-profit institutions. Governments benefit from economies of scale that, in principle, enable the provision of coverage at a lower cost to people living in poverty. At the same time, however, the for-profit private sector outperforms the public sector in the range and scope of insurance instruments it provides. These supplement public action and enable an appropriate mix of programmes, both market and non-market oriented. It was acknowledged that both sectors lack adequate communication and it was emphasized that coordination channels should be introduced. Another major supplement of public action is not-for-profit institutional schemes such as those provided by non-governmental organizations, including community based organizations and other civil society bodies. Building partnerships among all these actors is an important prerequisite for advancing a sustainable and coherent social protection regime.

Impact of globalization

The impact of globalization on social protection is complex and interpretations about what the main causes of inefficient or ineffective social protection systems vary. One view is that globalization is the main cause of increased inequality. The Asian crisis led to deterioration in education and health care in numerous countries. Similarly, the reduction of government revenues due to trade liberalization and service of the external debt has shrunk the pool of resources available for social policies. Another view is that, notwithstanding the negative implications of globalization, domestic factors remain a far larger determinant of the inability of countries to improve the performance of their social protection systems. It is argued that the strengthening of institutions and the introduction of appropriate regulations at the country level could help shield the domestic economy from external shocks. According to this view, countries should institute economic and social policies that seek to reduce their exposure to the latter. Admittedly, it is often the case that the external dependency of the developing countries will require support from the international community, both in terms of external debt relief and technical cooperation.

Trends in policy-making and experiences from reforms in social protection systems

In the last decade, we have witnessed the adoption of policy-making that has a strong neo-liberal bent, which has deprived large groups of social protection coverage. In fact, marginalization and the number of excluded persons have actually increased. It is essential that social protection systems be comprehensively assessed in order to guarantee coverage to populations. Some countries have structurally reformed their systems to reduce fiscal costs and expand coverage. For the most part, they have introduced private market-oriented instruments, such as the individual capitalization accounts and private health-care insurance. While in some countries, as a result of mixed strategies, the quality of programmes has improved, in others they led to rising administrative costs, discouraged the expansion of coverage and provided incentives for non-compliance and evasion.

National dialogue is important in the design and reform of social protection. Comprehensive social protection reforms can make an important contribution to making societies more inclusive and reducing the extent of marginalization.

In Europe, some of the challenges to social protection are being met at the regional level. A common methodology for assessing the extent of marginalization and other indicators are being developed in the context of the European Union. A precondition for the development of common indicators has been political and socio-economic cohesiveness of this particular region. In other regions of the world, there are substantial differences in the circumstances facing countries, in particular developing countries and countries with economies in transition, in meeting the challenges of social protection. Despite the varying circumstances facing different regions, there are important lessons to be learned and all countries would benefit from sharing their experiences and best practices.

There is a substantial need for improvement of public understanding of how social protection systems work. There is need for public information and social dialogue. Lack of information has led to declining confidence and a crisis of credibility of social protection systems in many countries. In many countries, social security constitutes one of the largest shares of public budgets. There are examples of Governments that have “borrowed” from national social protection funds for use on other purposes. Enhanced public oversight combined with institutional autonomy contributes to the responsible use of funds.

Active policy paradigm

Social protection is the active pursuit of strategies to increase the well-being of the population, enhance social development and ensure that individuals can develop to their fullest potential. It is a socio-political process that is profoundly ideologized and that implies negotiation and the bringing together of the interests of different groups for the common good. Social protection is envisioned as an organized armoury of instruments that go beyond social security. It should be a very active policy because of the rapid change in both post-industrial/developed societies and in the developing world. In the developed world, high unemployment and high retirement rates imply the need for new programmes in education and training and long-term health care. In the developing world, the increased informalization of the labour force and widespread poverty require implementing new initiatives to reduce vulnerability.

Very clearly, major budget decisions will have to be made to fund these new challenges. In part, reallocation of budget lines, both public and private, and the establishment of very specific quantitative goals will allow a focused attention to social protection. More efficient use of existing budgetary resources is indispensable. Not only expanding revenues on the agenda, but also attaining increased efficiency in social spending is a priority.

It is not possible to define fixed minimum levels of expenditure in the social sectors. Instead one should focus on the correlation of the level of social spending as a percentage of gross domestic product (GDP) and levels of poverty. Therefore, commitment to poverty eradication is an implicit guarantee that there are sufficient resources available. In this regard, mechanisms for monitoring outcomes are needed. Very few countries have the capacity to measure the impact of given activities in the social sphere. It is very important, however, that countries develop the capacity to monitor and evaluate the results of social investment. This process will allow for continuous re-evaluation and review of investment flows and programmes.

Gender-sensitive and child-sensitive approaches

Gender mainstreaming is a crucial aspect of the social protection agenda. At the same time, since the fate of children is so closely linked to that of women, social protection should also be child-sensitive. This is a vexing problem because of competing claims on resources, which means that women and children are often at the end of the line in terms of budgetary allocation. This is of particular concern in the context of mandatory systems. Women remain very much discriminated against and form part of the marginalized group. The design of social security systems does not necessarily address their specific needs and the challenges they face. Poverty is more prevalent among female single-headed households with small children. In order to go to work, women need a whole array of services and support, which, for the most part, is currently non-existent.

Quantitative goals and capacity-building

Evidence shows that increases in resources available for social policies reduce the extent of poverty. A firm commitment on the part of Governments and societies to allocate a larger share of total production to this end is required. Formulating clearly defined quantitative goals allows for monitoring, supervising and assessing progress as well as benchmarking for further developments. In order to be able to define and monitor progress, countries need to strengthen their statistical capabilities and support services. Attention should be paid to the professional and technical development of social protection specialists (managers, directors, chief executive officers, etc.) in individual countries. This is particularly relevant in the developing world, where lack of capacity and technical skills makes the implementation of the present recommendation extremely difficult.

Social protection as investment in human capital

Social protection is a necessary component of social development. It enables the attainment of human rights in the economic and social fields rather than its mere proclamation. It is a way to make the economy and society work better and to maintain social cohesion and peace. Furthermore, social protection expenditure should be considered as an investment in the future of the society rather than a mere expense. This expenditure permits society to sustain and enhance its human capital. By definition, it is not residual but forms part of the structure of economic and social policy-making.

Extending coverage to unprotected workers

There is unambiguous evidence that a very large group of workers remains marginalized and excluded from social protection. Some work in rural areas, remote locations that are resource-poor or in marginal urban neighbourhoods. There is no single answer to the question on how to extend protection to these workers. Civil society and community-based organizations are often the only ones that reach out to this important group. However, more organized state-run schemes should be put in place to standardize benefits and incorporate them into national protection systems.

Chairman’s summary of the expert panel discussion on the role of volunteerism in the promotion of social development

35. At the 12th meeting, on 23 February, on the proposal of the Chairman, the Commission decided to include in its report the Chairman’s summary of the expert panel on the role of volunteerism in the promotion of social development (see chap. I, sect. E, decision 39/103).

36. The Chairman’s summary of the expert panel discussion on the role of volunteerism in the promotion of social development is set out below:

I. Forms and functions of volunteerism

A. Organizational settings

1. It is possible to identify at least four different types of organizational settings for volunteering: mutual aid or self-help; philanthropy or service to others; participation; and advocacy or campaigning. Each of these settings can be found in all parts of the world, though the form each takes and the balance or mix among them differ markedly according to economic, social, political and cultural situations. These organizational settings are not mutually exclusive. Volunteers who engage in mutual aid may also be involved in participatory movements and may benefit others apart from members of their own group. Similarly, volunteers involved with philanthropic or service delivery agencies may be involved in advocacy and campaigning.

B. Characteristics of voluntary activity

2. Volunteerism is dynamic. Its definition varies over time and among and within cultures, and may reflect a sense of enlightened self-interest in the volunteer. Despite its many guises, there are three core elements that can be attributed to voluntary activity in its many forms. First, it is not undertaken for financial gain. Second, it is carried out freely and without compulsion. Third, it benefits both the volunteer and the person or party whom the action is meant to aid. By emphasizing exchange and reciprocity, this last point challenges the traditional stereotype of volunteering as charity.

3. Though local definitions of volunteerism continue to evolve in response to the priorities of the community, many voluntary activities are rooted in ancient customs of caring and sharing. For example, Bhutanese traditions for managing common natural resources such as firewood collection, fire control and prevention and wildlife protection continue to influence that country’s culture of environmental volunteerism. Conservation ethics are shaped by the Buddhist principle of respect for life in all of its forms.

C. The blurred edges of volunteerism

4. Despite its common characteristics, definitions of volunteerism are still ambiguous. Issues arise with regard to “compulsory volunteering”, such as that advocated by educators and courts in some countries. This concept may appear to be contradictory. A similar problem may apply to the matter of unpaid domestic work.

5. Many organizations concerned with volunteering are faced with another paradox: the professionalization of volunteerism. As voluntary activities become increasingly specialized, so do the skills required of the volunteers who undertake them. Thus, opportunities for volunteers without specific training continue to shrink in some areas as the degree of professionalism required continues to rise.

II. Building societies: the impact of volunteerism

A. Social capital: networks of solidarity, webs of interaction

6. Volunteerism is both a source and a reflection of social capital, it is part of the informal web of solidarity that binds societies together and that provides many communities with the most basic of social safety nets. Volunteering is a key form of social capital, nurturing a community’s social networks and its reciprocal norms. “Generalized reciprocity” reflects a belief that although volunteers may not be immediately recompensed for their voluntary efforts, they can realistically expect that their efforts will be recognized in the future. By nurturing trust and establishing a pattern of generalized reciprocity, volunteerism binds societies together. This can provide protection from some of the more disruptive effects of globalization by reinforcing cultural identity and allowing both the costs and benefits of socio-economic change to be shared more equitably.

B. International actors and national volunteerism

7. International actors can affect the shape of national volunteerism. Volunteer sending agencies have had a large impact on the national characteristic of voluntary action in many developing countries. Many countries in sub-Saharan Africa, for example, identify service volunteering with the highly visible programmes of volunteer sending agencies that have met critical human resource needs in areas such as health care and education and helped build national capacity through training and other means. This support has helped turn attention to the development of domestic service volunteerism through the establishment of volunteer centres and the formation of volunteers service schemes.

8. Social capital generated by voluntary action is vital to the development efforts of people living in poverty. World Bank research in Bolivia, Burkina Faso and Indonesia indicates a positive correlation between participation in local organizations and levels of poverty. The empowering effects of social mobilization are particularly important in this equation, creating a virtuous cycle of participation, advocacy and development. Thus, international development agents may factor the lessons of local volunteerism into their support to programmes of national governments.

III. Creating spaces: Government action on volunteering

A. Measuring and enabling volunteerism

9. Governments can work with and enhance local networks by facilitating links with intermediary organizations, broader markets and public institutions. Governments can develop integrated national development strategies by building enabling fiscal and legislative frameworks, raising public awareness of the contribution of voluntary action to general welfare and promoting voluntary action among excluded groups and in the private sector.

10. Governments can support research into the traditions of volunteering rooted in the culture of their societies, as well as into the contributions they make to the economy. A national survey of volunteering in the United Kingdom, for example, indicated that volunteerism adds approximately 40 million pounds to the gross domestic product

(GDP) each year. Such surveys facilitate the task of policy makers in integrating volunteer contributions into their planning. A United Nations Volunteers tool kit describing the procedures to be followed to measure volunteering was made available online on the day of the panel. Research should also address the social benefits of volunteering, such as social cohesion and inclusion. The results of these studies could be widely disseminated, for example, in schools, through the media, at places of worship and at periodic celebrations such as national days and International Volunteers Day. This can forge a common sense of purpose, facilitating and reinforcing interaction and cooperation among Governments, communities and other partners in development.

11. Opportunities for volunteering can be enhanced through legal, fiscal and regulatory measures that remove barriers to voluntary action. An environment supportive of local networks contributes to the creation of active rather than dependent citizens. Key issues include the legal status and registration requirements of local voluntary organizations, funding mechanisms and tenure rights over local resources. Governments may also wish to review regulations regarding qualifications for peoples wishing to work as volunteers in such areas as provision of health care and education.

12. Limited transportation and communication infrastructure can restrict people's ability to volunteer. This is especially true of geographically-dispersed populations and people living in poverty. A lack of meeting places, such as public parks, places of worship and community halls, inhibits people's ability to organize voluntary activities. Public investments in infrastructure can encourage voluntary activity.

13. Promoting volunteerism among older persons remains of central importance. Volunteering promotes a positive self-image and benefits both the volunteer and society. Older volunteers epitomize the ideal of active ageing by contributing to society and their own well-being through their voluntary activities. Similarly, people with disabilities can contribute their abilities and experiences through increased opportunities for and access to volunteering.

14. Governments can also play a key role in devising innovative ways to draw youth into civic life. Many young people may feel disaffected from or face hindrances to integration into society, especially those living in poverty, and this may weaken the fabric of some societies. Experience shows that when youth are offered creative and meaningful opportunities to contribute to the improvement of their communities they react very positively. Moreover, the impact is likely to have lasting results, given that volunteering in youth is a strong predictor of volunteering later in life.

B. Establishing a dialogue

15. An important strategy in the promotion of voluntary action involves the decentralization of resources and authority in order to bring service agencies closer to communities, enhance the latter's control over public services and increase accountability in the public sector. This, inter alia, opens space for parental involvement in schools, facilitates community involvement in local environmental programmes and promotes income-generating opportunities. Development initiatives at the local level should systematically involve users who are willing to invest their own time — an investment that would be recognized and rewarded.

16. Educational reforms based on effective public-private partnerships in Brazil have highlighted the benefits of involving volunteers in decentralization schemes. Evaluations indicate that when schools are opened to parental and community participation, performance markedly improves. There are gains in day-to-day management efficiency; dialogue between teachers and parents becomes the rule rather than the exception; there is greater community support to at-risk students; and waste and patronage are curtailed.

17. Similar results have been documented in the field of basic health care provision. The involvement of volunteers in public-private partnerships has led to improvements in health services for people with disabilities, preventative outreach, blood donation levels and in the physical condition of hospitals. Public attitudes towards government health workers are also improved when the local population's active support is linked to health initiatives. People's involvement in their personal and collective well-being is an important contribution to the success of primary health care programmes.

18. In South Africa, the shift toward decentralized, participatory governance has involved dialogue with volunteers. The establishment of local transformation committees has given citizens a direct say in the provision of welfare services. Comprised of community-based organizations, faith-based and women's groups and the organized welfare and development sectors, local transformation committees identify and prioritize community needs, provide input to policy designs, plan and coordinate education and awareness programmes and support government projects at the local level. The local transformation committees not only help the Government in its efforts to revitalize the welfare system, but lend increased effectiveness to these efforts by showing that the population has a hand in their design.

C. Balancing rights and responsibilities

19. Government support for volunteering is cost-effective, but it is not cost free. In welcoming and expanding its network of partners, a government does not curtail its traditional roles and responsibilities. The promotion of citizen participation represents a win/win strategy, not a confrontation or a second best option. Public-private partnerships are desirable insofar as they increase the efficiency and outreach of government programmes and strengthen people's and community's trust in themselves and their relations with their governments.

20. Measures have been taken in Germany and the United Kingdom to clarify the balance of rights and responsibilities between the Government and the volunteer. For example, in the United Kingdom, a compact has been signed with all stakeholders in voluntary action that sets out the rights and responsibilities of all parties, facilitating volunteerism while allowing it to maintain its autonomy.

Dialogue with non-governmental organizations segment

37. At the 5th meeting, on 15 February, the Commission held a dialogue with non-governmental organizations in consultative status with the Economic and Social Council. Particular reference was made to paragraphs 9 and 8, respectively, of these resolutions, in which the Secretary-General was requested to ensure that in presenting the programme budget, expected accomplishments and, where possible, indicators of achievement were included to measure achievements in the implementation of the programmes of the Organization and not those of individual Member States;

(b) Comments were made that external factors had been drafted with too much emphasis on Member States. Views were expressed that external factors should be reformulated in more general terms and a specific recommendation was made to add "favourable international environment" as an external factor.
